Sinatra grew up in a tough neighborhood, but he always had a love of music. He started singing at a young age, and by the time he was a teenager, he was performing in local clubs.

In 1935, Sinatra joined the Tommy Dorsey Orchestra. He quickly became one of the most popular singers in the band, and his recordings with Dorsey helped to launch his career. In 1942, Sinatra left Dorsey to start his own solo career. He signed with Capitol Records and released a string of hit singles, including "My Way" and "New York, New York."

In the 1950s, Sinatra became a member of the Rat Pack, a group of entertainers that also included Dean Martin, Sammy Davis Jr., Peter Lawford, and Joey Bishop. The Rat Pack performed together in Las Vegas and on television, and they quickly became one of the most popular entertainment groups in the world.

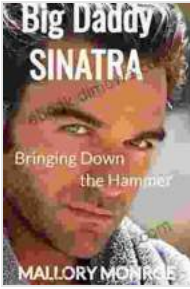

Sinatra's career continued to flourish in the 1960s and 1970s. He starred in several films, including "From Here to Eternity" and "The Manchurian Candidate." He also continued to record hit singles, including "Strangers in the Night" and "That's Life."

The Later Years

Sinatra's career began to decline in the 1980s. He struggled with alcohol and depression, and his voice began to deteriorate. He retired from performing in 1995, but he continued to make occasional appearances until his death in 1998.
