- Your name, contact information, and high school
- Your sport and position

- Your height, weight, and athletic stats
- Your academic transcript
- Your ACT or SAT scores
- Your athletic resume
- Your personal statement

Your recruiting profile is your chance to make a good first impression on college coaches. Take the time to put together a well-written and comprehensive profile that showcases your skills and abilities.

Contacting College Coaches

Once you have created a recruiting profile, you need to start contacting college coaches. You can do this by:

- Attending college camps
- Sending emails to coaches
- Calling coaches on the phone
- Visiting college campuses

When you contact college coaches, be sure to be professional and respectful. Introduce yourself, state your interest in their program, and provide them with your recruiting profile. Be prepared to answer questions about your athletic ability, your academic achievements, and your personal goals.

Evaluating College Offers

Once you start receiving offers from college coaches, you need to carefully evaluate each one. Consider the following factors when making your decision:

- The academic reputation of the school
- The athletic success of the program
- The location of the school
- The size of the school
- The cost of attendance
- The scholarship offer

It is important to remember that the recruiting process is a two-way street. You need to find a school that is a good fit for you both academically and athletically. Don't be afraid to ask questions and visit campuses before making your decision.

Negotiating the Best Scholarship Offer

Once you have decided on a school, you need to negotiate the best scholarship offer possible. This is where your recruiting profile and your negotiating skills will come in handy.

When negotiating your scholarship offer, be sure to:

- Be prepared to discuss your athletic ability and your academic achievements
- Be willing to negotiate the terms of your scholarship

- Be professional and respectful

Remember, the goal is to get the best possible scholarship offer that meets your needs. Don't be afraid to walk away from a deal that doesn't meet your expectations.

The recruiting process can be a long and challenging one, but it is also an exciting one. By following the tips in this guide, you can increase your chances of getting recruited by the college of your dreams.
